Te Aranga Marae | Sir Roger Douglas

Education & Youth Unemployment = a challenge for Flaxmere

Noting Flaxmere is decile one, Sir Roger spoke about the tragic double-whammy for kids who leave school without the right skills to gain employment.

"The abolition of youth wages means many school leavers in low socio-economic areas, unable to get their foot in the door, are forced to live off their parents, or sit on a benefit for $180 a week."

Sir Roger explained that because minimum wages demanded $510 of productive output per worker per 40 hour week, a high level of skills or work ethic was needed before a person became economic to employ. Maori youth unemployment was now at 39 percent as a result of Labour's policy.

"Many school leavers require costly on-the-job training. It is a tragedy that a young person cannot take a job offer at $10 an hour and gain skills, but is rather now incentivised to join a gang and sell drugs to supplement their income."
